

Abstract

The diploma thesis on "Support of people with disabilities at work in the context of social work" deals with the social rehabilitation service with the supported employment method and focuses on the target group of people with disabilities. The goal is to find out how useful this service is for its users.

The first part of the diploma thesis describes the general issue of people with disabilities, together with the characteristic of the service of supported employment. This part also deals with the historical development of the service, the legislative framework, the methods of working with the users and the role of the social worker in terms of the service of supported employment.

Another part of the diploma thesis is focused on the practice in terms of providing this service. There is described the methodological part of the diploma thesis, which is elaborated by qualitative research in the form of structured interviews and is illustrated by case studies.

From the point of view of the realization of qualitative research, the assumption of great benefit for persons with disabilities using the services of supported employment was confirmed, which is also indicative of the good quality of this service.
