

Abstract

The bachelor thesis deals with the development of the Ronov family and mainly its subsequent branching. In the introduction, the work focuses on the emergence of the nobility and later on its subsequent operation in the Jagiellonian period. The Ronov family is presented, its "mythical" ancestors according to medieval chronicles and subsequently proven members of the family. The work mainly follows the Berka family of Dubá, its influence and property during the reign of the Přemyslids, Luxemburghs, during the Hussite storms and mostly during the reign of George of Poděbrady and during the reign of the Jagiellons on the Czech throne. In whose time he will focus on the court and the chief judge of court Jaroslav Berka of Dubá. The work tries to map the changing possessions of the family, the issue of marriage, frequent names in the family and the gradual fall of formerly powerful masters until the 18th century, when their influence declines and family members are almost in oblivion.
