Abstract

The problems associated with the realization of the rights of nations without their own states are quite discussed. Some nations conquer others within the framework of state expansion, after which many nations are on the verge of solving many problems - how to survive, how to realize their political, social, cultural rights within the existing reality? In this thesis work, a specific example of one small northern nation in the Far East of Russia, the Evenks, was taken.

In the first part, models of federalism were considered, one of which is Russian federalism. Russian federalism is unique for a number of reasons, but the main thing is a complex federal structure - some subjects of the federation within others, a national-territorial and at the same time territorial type of federation.

In the second part, the position of the Evenks in Russia was studied, the indicators of knowledge of the language, the presence of their own territorial autonomies, the evolution of their position within the Russian state were studied.

In the third part, the experiences of other states were considered in relation to their small nations - Canada and China. A comparison was made of the position of small nations in these countries, on the one hand, and the position of the Evenks of Russia, on the other.

In conclusion, the results of the work done are summarized, an assessment of the prospects and some theoretical recommendations are given.
