

Abstract

The radio interview is one of the basic genres used in radio. This practical bachelor's thesis is based on two radio interviews recorded by the author of the thesis with personalities of former Czechoslovak politics who experienced the division of the country into the successor states of the Czech and Slovak Republics in important positions.

The theoretical part of the thesis first describes the historical event of the division of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republics using the mentioned expert sources. Next, the author of the thesis attempts to briefly summarize the situation of the two successor countries and their mutual relations 30 years after the act of partition. An important part of the theoretical part of the thesis is the introduction of the respondents for the radio interviews, which form the practical part. And the author of the thesis also defines the concept of a radio interview on the basis of the literature, explains the differences between its different variants and describes the practical aspect of the creation of such an interview on the basis of a concrete example.

The practical part of the thesis covers 2 radio interviews, which are sometimes enlivened by short audio inserts (e.g. from the author's previous interviews), which add to the complexity of the result in terms of content and dramaturgy. The two main radio interviews are conducted with a representative of the Slovak side - former member of the Slovak National Council and diplomat Peter Weiss and a representative of the Czech side - former member of the Federal Assembly Daniel Kroupa.
