

Abstrakt

The diploma thesis deals with the issue of non-substance addictions among juveniles. For understanding and better orientation in the issue, the terms of social pathology and other terms related to the topic of the work are explained in the theoretical part. The theoretical part mainly focuses on the addictive behavior of teenagers on the Internet and social networks. It examines the specific effects of this phenomenon in relation to adolescents and their upbringing. The work also deals with the possibilities of prevention and treatment. The practical part examines the influence and impact of the Internet and social networks on adolescents and their upbringing. The aim of the diploma thesis is to analyze the issue of non-substance addictions among adolescents and the influence on their education. A questionnaire survey was chosen as the research method.

Keywords:

netholism, non-substance addiction, prevention, education