This bachelor's thesis discusses high school youth's awareness of contraception in the context of sex education.

In the theoretical part, the concepts of adolescence, sex education, health literacy and contraception were explained.

The empirical part is based on a non-standardized quantitative questionnaire survey, which was used to obtain information on the extent and form of sex education in high schools, the awareness of contraception among high school students, where students get their first information about contraception and what is the preferred form of contraception among students. The age group targeted by the survey is 15-20 years. The respondents were students of two high schools.
