Title:

Features of foreign investment in developing countries

Abstract:

This thesis explores the issue of foreign investment in developing countries. The focus is mainly on the contractual relationship between China and African countries. This thesis answers the questions of what the features of African Chinese investment treaties are and whether these investment treaties are comparable to the treaties that China concludes with developed countries. In order to understand these issues, the thesis first discusses the history of investment protection and defines the basic concepts in this legal area. The following chapters provide a detailed analysis of bilateral investment treaties concluded between developing states as well as developed states. The aim of the thesis is to review the implications of these African Chinese treaties for Africa.
