

Abstract (in English):

This thesis focuses on the problematics of Czech-Korean marriages. In the theoretical part, it delves into the concept of marriage and its evolution in the Czech Republic and South Korea, as well as the main aspects of mixed marriages, their characteristics, cultural conflict, and it deals with specifically Czech-Korean marriages. The core of the work lies in the empirical research and analysis of statements from Czech-Korean married couples living in both countries across various thematic areas. This research provides insights into their lives, highlighting the challenges and problems that respondents encounter in their marital relationships. Lastly, it examines whether these couples lean more towards Czech or Korean lifestyles and how the country of long-term residence influences this preference.