

Pulsating stars undergo changes, i.e. perpetual expansion and contraction, temperature changes, color changes. These changes result in variations of emitted light. Variation is usually periodical and often consists of several distinct processes with their respective frequencies and amplitudes. This thesis focuses on identifying pulsation frequencies of studied stars and comparing results acquired from data from different sources.