

Abstract

The master thesis on the topic "The impact of study abroad scholarships on future migration" aims to explain how scholarships influence the mindset and decision-making processes of their participants. It focuses in particular on the Erasmus+ programme as the most important representative of foreign scholarships in Europe. The theoretical part introduces important concepts that explain the migration behaviour of individuals, the historical development of study scholarships and their importance, and defines typologies of migration. It introduces the Erasmus+ programme, its development, scope and impact on individuals. The research part works with research based on qualitative and quantitative data from questionnaire surveys and structured interviews.
