

The thesis studies and calculates permutations whose cycles have prescribed lengths. The first part introduces a class of permutations whose cycles have lengths one and two, and presents several related problems. In the second part, we examine other classes of permutations as well as methods for calculating their number. In addition to a combinatorial approach, an analytical approach using exponential generating functions is shown.