

Abstract

This bachelor's thesis focuses on exploring the changes and contexts in the treatment of strangers as reflected in the biblical book of Ruth and their relationship to current social and cultural norms. The aim of the thesis is to analyse attitudes towards foreigners in the text of the biblical book of Ruth and compare them with current attitudes and responses to migration and multiculturalism in the world today.

The focus of this thesis is to understand the values of hospitality and integration presented in the biblical book of Ruth and their application and relevance in the contemporary cultural context. Through this approach, we seek to provide an understanding of the ethical and moral issues involved in welcoming and interacting with strangers in today's multicultural world.

Our work emphasizes the exploration of aspects of this issue in order to contribute to a richer understanding and discussion of behavior towards foreigners both in the past and in the present.
