

The thesis critically analyses modern consumer culture and its negative effects on the individual and on society as a whole. The author conceives civil society as a way of countering these negative effects, as it accentuates the values of solidarity and fellowship with others; therefore, they emphasise the cultural aspects of civil society, which serve as an area for the active formation of the future.