

The aim of my work is to describe the problems of the nursing process in a patient with acute alcoholic hepatitis. Patients with this diagnosis, I have chosen deliberately, because I was interested in long term drug and alcohol.

Just alcohol, which is classified as a heavy drug, is the originator of the disease in selected patients.

I divided into three parts. The first is clinical, where I very briefly mentioned the anatomy and physiological functions of the liver. I mentioned the possibilities of the human body to metabolize alcohol and irreplaceable role of the liver in this area. From a general chapter on the pathogenesis of liver injury, I focused and detailed descriptions of acute alcoholic hepatitis in its breadth of clinical and laboratory findings. Its place there are also complications of alcoholic hepatitis, treatment options and the severity of the forecast. The second part deals přednemocničnĕmu the time of hospitalization, and my patient. I mentioned a comprehensive course of his hospitalization with all the diagnostic methods and conclusions.

The third part is the essence of my work. I described the problems of the nursing process in a patient with acute alcoholic hepatitis, which is complicated by hepatic encephalopathy. I believe that most nursing model is the model of Virginia Henderson. Comprehensively mapped the patient's needs and the model supporting the creation of the nursing process. The important point is the description of the immobilization to protect the health of the patient.

In conclusion, mention the possibilities of education and psychological assessment and the patient's prognosis from the perspective of nurses. Attachments include nursing documentation and list of abbreviations.
