

Abstract

Objective of the research is to explore what is the perception of the anti-roma marches by adult members of Roma minority and what are the coping strategies they applied in order to deal with the situations they faced. Empirical part of the research consists of five interviews. Grounded theory is applied for evaluation of the interviews. Respondents viewed the anti-roma marches from a perspective of the teoretical background of problems and the legitimacy of punishment. Respondents applied wide range of coping strategies in order to deal with situations, most of the strategies were collective. Majority of strategies were related with preventive measures in order to secure the accommodation facilities.