

Křesťanská společnost (Christian Fellowship) is an integral part of the Czech pentecostal movement, or more precisely of its charismatic part for almost 17 years. Founded shortly after the fall of communism by Dan Drápal, formerly vicar of the Evangelical church of Czech Brethren, Christian fellowship wasn't originally meant to become a church. Drápal started his ministry in a small congregation in 1977 in Prague as a liberal oriented Christian, but after two years he was born again and then baptized in Holy Spirit. The congregation experienced an incredibly quick growth through the late 80s, which first led to problems with the communist Secret police and then to discussions with the Evangelical church of Czech Brethren itself concerning different ways of understanding. The separation came later, in 1990.
