

My bachelor thesis is titled "The experience of students with mobbing". Its aim was to determine whether employed students of the tertiary professional school Jabok and students of the Protestant Theological Faculty of the Charles University studying social work and pastoral care have experience with mobbing. The theoretical part contains the characteristics of mobbing and related concepts, actors and phases of mobbing. The special chapters are devoted to the categories of mobbing attacks, strategies of mobbing and preventive techniques against mobbing. The practical part consists of a description, a data analysis and an evaluation of results, in which 40 respondents took part. The aim of the survey was to explore whether employed students of social work are at risk of mobbing and to find out what types of attacks typical for mobbing are parts of their work experience. The results were then compared with the results of the author of this questionnaire, Petr Mareš. The results showed that students experience with mobbing in their jobs is comparable to a number of attacks on civil servants and more than a quarter of students are threatened by mobbing, or even experiencing ongoing mobbing.
