

Abstract

Intelligence services are vital security system elements of each democratic state. Access to the important intel without any lags is basic for state to survive. No state, nor the democratic nor the totalitarian can survive without intelligence. On the other hand, strong based and rooted oversight is nature in democratic states.

Basic purpose of this work is in examination of the situation in the Czech republic, where intelligence system reform should be prepared as soon as possible. Especially in the light of misuse of the military intelligence by prime minister's mistress in 2013. In advance, the limits of current oversight methods and system should be find.

Deborah Stone's, professor of Dartmouth university, in the Czech republic rare theory called Policy Paradox is used as main for this work. It was chosen because it brings new view on the current intelligence system setup and its oversight. This analytical model see creation of public policy as continuous clash of personal and public interests. In advanced it is in opposition to the traditional view of policy from the market perspective and it provide new view as ancient polis where you have to beer the public interest on your mind.
