

Abstract

This diploma thesis is focused on the attitudes of the witnesses to the transfer of Germans from Czechoslovakia after the second world war (WWII). The aim of the thesis are attitudes of the eye witnesses of the incidents of the WWII and incidents that happened directly after the WWII to this issue, as well as to find out why is this their attitude and if this attitude wasn't possibly changed in passing years.

The work consists of a contextual part, where is analyzed relevant literature and where is created a picture of the context of the times before the transfer and the times of the transfer and all this in the light of nationalist phenomenon.

The work also contains a research part of a qualitative survey, an empirical survey. The research approach is biographical approach and narrative and narrative semistructured interviews were chosen as a data collective method. The research as well as its subsequent analysis are based on the methodological literature.