

Abstract

The thesis deals with St. Augustine's concept of human nature from the anthropological perspective and in its relation to God's grace. It is based on a detailed description of the period in which St. Augustine lived; both in terms of a school of thoughts of educated classes of the Roman Empire and in terms of general relations among people of that era. This matter becomes more apparent in a polemic with other contemporary concepts about man's salvation.