

Abstract:

The thesis is devoted to the women's consideration about the safe place for the childbirth. The goal is to find out the subjective needs of the women giving birth through spontaneous vaginal delivery and what is the significant factor moving them into the decision of choosing the birthplace. To set up the recommendations into the practice and to support the women for their spontaneous birth in the healthcare facilities is the next target. The dialogues in the quantitative research have shown us how the women could see the world around themselves and what are the important events for their lives. The result of this survey reveals that neither specific delivery room nor technical parameters are such a crucial thing. The basic factor that influences their feeling of safety is a warm atmosphere and the professional attitude of the medical staff. Generally, the women are not satisfied with the behaviour of the medical staff and they do not trust them. In fact, they admit that the attitude of healthcare providers towards them is unprofessional and unethical. Under such experience, some women could be forced into the decision of homebirth. The factual suggestions summarized in the final part could prevent such situations.
